Source A

From an account of the Great Rebellion in 1174, by William of Newburgh, a monk based in a northern English monastery.

Henry II had, by this time, returned to England from Normandy, and prepared to hurl himself against his son who was expected to arrive with Flemish forces. But remembering how greatly he had sinned against Canterbury, the King hastened there as soon as he had landed, and prayed at the tomb of the blessed Archbishop Thomas. He was beaten by the monks in turn. On that same day, God in his goodness overthrew the King’s most mighty enemy, the King of Scots on the extreme border of England. Departing from Canterbury, the King hastened to London and, having sent the army on before him against Hugh Bigod, he himself made a short stay there.

Source B

From Ralph of Diceto, who was writing in the 1180s, reflecting back on the Great Rebellion. He was the Dean of St Paul’s in London.

Whilst Henry II was in England, Louis the Young King and the Count of Flanders gathered a huge army and besieged Rouen. The Normans resisted valiantly despite being outnumbered. They remained unperturbed by the enemy’s threats and survived frequent attacks resolutely. This siege persisted for days until the French King received reports that Henry had approached Rouen in force. Louis was reduced to a state of utter bewilderment and afraid that Henry would invade France and besiege Paris. After discussing what to do with his advisors, both the French and the Flemings burned their siege engines, tore down their tents and retreated from the city. They both saw that they were wasting their efforts and decided to stop attacking the Normans.

With reference to these sources and your understanding of the historical context, which of these two sources is more valuable in explaining why Henry II was able to defeat the Great Rebellion?
