MPs call for inquest as Corbyn fails election test

Labour must 'look at itself' after council setback

Francis Elliott Political Editor
Sam Coates, Lucy Fisher

Jeremy Corbyn was criticised by MPs and defeated candidates yesterday for not dealing with antisemitism as his party failed to secure predicted victories in the local elections. Labour did not win any London councils from the Tories and suffered reverses in former strongholds that voted to leave the EU, in a disappointing performance castigated by one frontbencher as "amateur hour".

The Conservatives were the main beneficiaries from the almost total collapse of Ukip, enabling Theresa May to confound predictions of heavy losses. With all but one set of results declared, Labour was showing a net gain of 57 and the Tories a net loss of 28; the Liberal Democrats were up 75.

Boris Johnson seized on the outcome as evidence that Tory supporters expected and wanted Brexit, saying that Mr Corbyn had been punished for his commitment to remain in a customs union with the EU.

Several Labour figures, however, blamed Mr Corbyn's inaction over antisemitism for his failure to win key councils such as Westminster, Wandsworth and Barnet, Labour's top target. Barry Rawlings, Barnet's Labour leader, said that too many members of the Jewish community felt that Labour had "failed to deal with antisemitism on a national level". Adam Langbein, a defeated Labour candidate, called on Mr Corbyn to visit the borough and apologise to its Jewish community.

Jess Phillips, the Labour MP for Birmingham Yardley, said: "The antisemitism problem has been a problem [for Labour] in big metropolitan areas like London and Birmingham. The Labour Party has to look at the results, have a really honest strategy about it to improve it, a real hard honest look at itself."

One Labour frontbencher blamed the "inexperience and hubris" of Mr Corbyn's team for building up unrealistic expectations, including that the party might sweep London. Overall gains would now be presented as a setback, the source said, describing the approach as a "schoolboy error".

Another member of Mr Corbyn's frontbench team told The Times: "At this stage of the parliament, in the aftermath of the home secretary's resignation and all the rest, the opposition should be doing much, much better."

He added: "Our campaign was woeful but we've mucked out London. The problem is that we are not winning provincial England. There was no strategy. Allowing the expectations to get out of kilter was amateur hour."

The Tories themselves lost control of significant councils such as Richmond, southwest London, South Cambridge
