Arvin, a police officer, saw Brett and Chas come out of a shop. Both were laughing and Arvin heard Brett say to Chas, "Did you see the way she went down when I punched her?" Arvin was aware of a woman screaming in the shop. He followed Brett, stopped him and asked for his name. Brett said, "Mouse, officer. But you can call me Mickey."

Suggest why, according to English law (Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984), Arvin could lawfully arrest Brett in these circumstances.

Deon and Faith founded 'Stopcar' to organise and participate in marches and demonstrations against the use of petrol and diesel fuel cars. These events were often violently opposed by another group, 'Oilheads', who insisted on their right to drive cars of any kind.

Deon and Faith spent two months planning a major protest event. The plan was to march to three petrol stations and occupy each one in turn for two hours. During that time, no car would be able to enter or leave. Deon gave the police only two days' notice of the event. The police then instructed Deon that Stopcar could march to one petrol station only and occupy it for one hour with no more than 20 protesters. As soon as the event was publicised, Faith received threats to her life from Oilheads if the event went ahead. She reported the threats to the police. However, the police made no special arrangements to protect her.

On the day of the event, Deon encouraged Stopcar protesters to ignore the restrictions. Fights with Oilheads members broke out when the protesters tried to follow their original planned route. The senior police officer present ordered all Stopcar protesters to end the march and disperse, and some were arrested when they refused. At that moment, Geri, an Oilheads member, ran up to Faith and stabbed her repeatedly, causing serious injury.

Taking a human rights perspective, consider the application of English law and the European Convention on Human Rights to the incidents arising out of the events described.
