Housing in sub-Saharan Africa improves but millions still live in slums

A new study of housing quality in sub-Saharan Africa states ‘there has been a dramatic improvement in living conditions during the past 15 years’.

Researchers found housing had improved across several measures during the period. Amount of living space, access to water and sanitation, and good quality construction were found in 23% of houses in 2015, up from 11% in 2000.

The study’s author said, “Our study shows that many people are investing in their homes, but there is also an urgent need for governments to help improve infrastructure.”
