SECTION A*Answer Question 01.*EXTRACT A

In the early years of his reign, much of Henry VIII's energy, and the wealth inherited from his father, was wasted in the futile attempt to reproduce the victories of Henry V in France. The complicated diplomacy and numerous military campaigns of this period seem to have brought no lasting benefit to the country. Henry was also excessively aggressive in domestic matters. Henry was young and ambitious and responded ruthlessly to any threat to his position. Henry had his father's councillors, Empson and Dudley, arrested in April 1509 and executed a year later. In 1513 he ordered the execution of Edmund de la Pole and in 1521 had the Duke of Buckingham executed.

EXTRACT B

In 1509, Henry VIII was a young, untried king, keen to prove himself on the battlefield. This behaviour was expected of a monarch. Not only were the nobility keen to fulfil their primary role of supporting their King in war, but other monarchs of Europe judged their rivals by performance in battle and Henry's invasion of France impressed Emperor Maximilian. However, Henry's real success came in Scotland. In times of peace, Henry's priorities were hunting and jousting in which activities he was supported by young nobles. Before the mid-1520s, Henry intervened in domestic policies only as he felt inclined, sometimes showing surprising knowledge of issues, but by and large he let others get on with governing the country.
