SECTION A*Answer Question 01.*EXTRACT A

There were significant strains and tensions in Tsarist society before 1917. In the 1890s Russia had embarked on rapid industrialisation, yet the absolutist monarchy had refused to admit to political power the industrial and professional classes created in this process. The consequent explosion in 1905 and the granting of the October Manifesto offered Tsardom a new opportunity to foster stability. Absolutism gave way to constitutional monarchy. Although doubt must exist as to whether the Tsar succeeded in creating a wider basis of support, it would be incorrect to deduce from the wave of strikes in 1912–14 that Nicholas II faced a truly revolutionary threat before 1914. There was no 20 possibility that the forces opposed to Tsardom could have formed a united coalition and destroyed the monarchy. It was the Great War that intensified, to breaking point, the 25 political and social stresses which pre-war policies had temporarily addressed, but without providing a lasting solution. It was the Great War that destroyed the Romanov dynasty. 30

EXTRACT B

The February/March revolution came as a surprise to everyone, both those within Russia and those abroad. From the 1890s, socialists of all types had ardently desired revolution and the abolition of the Romanov dynasty, yet there is no evidence that any of these groups saw the impending storm. Even Lenin, in Switzerland, was pessimistically preparing himself for the awful reality of not seeing revolution in Russia in his lifetime. However, even without the need for leaders, the ordinary workers and soldiers took over. In Petrograd, strikes involving workers, women and young people grew throughout February 1917 until the Tsarist government had a general strike on its hands. Even then,

Nicholas II did not feel unduly insecure and many Duma members, although wanting to end the existing government, still upheld the monarchy. The new element in the situation was the changed mood of the soldiers. Almost bloodlessly, workers and soldiers forced the Tsar's abdication. Imperial Russia collapsed with breathtaking suddenness.

EXTRACT C

In 1895, Tsar Nicholas II dismissed hopes of zemstvo representation in national government as a ‘senseless dream’. Such disregard for political change remained a feature of his rule. 5

The result was that his prestige was critically damaged, and with it, that of the autocracy. Nicholas was convinced, until the very end, that he was the best judge of the country’s mood. To him, protest and dissent were temporary and caused by agitators or selfish politicians. Even after the 1905 revolution had forced him to grant a popularly-elected Duma, Nicholas tried to narrow its sphere of competence. Nicholas lacked the talent needed for his role. 10 15

He sat for hours over papers of state, but this led, particularly in the last 20 years of his reign, to a near-paralysis at the centre of government.

His assumption of personal command over the armies in the field in 1915 was running away from government, 25 rather than an act of solidarity with his troops. It proved fatal; he was forced to abdicate in March 1917.
