SECTION A

Answer Question 01.

SOURCE A

From the minutes of a Cabinet meeting, 23 August 1931.

The Prime Minister informed the Cabinet that he was strongly in favour of accepting the May Committee's recommendations. The Bank of England needed to restore confidence in sterling. He warned the Cabinet of the dreadful consequences that would inevitably follow from a financial panic and a run on the pound. He was confident that a majority of the Party was in favour. If the government inflicted spending cuts and tax rises but made no significant reduction in unemployment benefit, it would alienate much middle-class support and lose the Party its moral prestige, which was one of its greatest assets. In conclusion, the Prime Minister admitted that the recommendations as a whole represented the opposite of everything that the Labour Party stood for, and yet he was absolutely satisfied that it was in the national interest to implement them if the country was to be saved. He then pointed out that, if on this question there were any important resignations, the government as a whole must resign.

SOURCE C

From the autobiography of Clement Attlee, 1954. Attlee was a member of MacDonald's Cabinet in 1930/31. Attlee turned down MacDonald's offer of a position in the National Government.

In the old days I had looked up to MacDonald as a great leader. The unpopular line he took during the Great War seemed to mark him as a man of character. I had not appreciated his defects until I entered the Cabinet as a junior minister. I then realised his reluctance to take positive action and noted with dismay his increasing vanity and snobbery. His habit of telling me the poor opinion he had of all his Cabinet colleagues made an unpleasant impression. I had not, however, expected that he would perpetuate the greatest betrayal in the political history of this country by accepting a commission from the King to form a so-called 'National' Government. The shock to the Party was very great. I had not thought him capable of such hatred of those who had served him loyally, though we had become conscious of a growing separation between him and the rest of the Party. He was increasingly mixing only with people who did not share Labour values.
